

Certainly, it is not easy to determine where to draw the line between necessary measures of defense, and unacceptable infringement of freedom. However, I feel that as a rule, the government should not examine private communications. As with wiretaps, exceptions to this rule might be appropriate under certain circumstances, but again, exactly what should those circumstances be? My own feeling (which I believe is in line with that of our founding fathers) is that in the long run it will prove better to err on the side of freedom.
